Concerning the Cowboy

The old timer had spent his entire life in the West. And now he was in a talkative mood as we gathered around the camp fire.

"The man who is strong rejoices in his tremendous strength," he began. "The man who is skilled takes pleasure in the renewed exercise of his skill. The old and staid cowboy might not care to run his horse as the younger members of the ranch staff took delight in doing. And the foreman of the ranch might not take an interest in rifle and pistol practice that the younger men did. Because he knew that he could shoot well enough already.

But each, young or old, followed the life of the West because he loved it for its freedom and its outdoor quality; also for the sheer attraction it offered to a vigorous and energetic man who needed outlet for his vitality and exercise for his muscles. It was natural, therefore, that the chief amusements of the cowboy should be those of the outdoor air and those more or less in line with his employment.

The cowboy was accustomed to the sight of big game and so had the edge of his appetite for its pursuit worn off. Moreover, he had his regular duties to perform so that he had not always time to go hunting. Yet he was a hunter, just as every Western man was a hunter in the times of the Western game. The weapons of the cowboy were a rifle, revolver, and rope. Of these, more properly the latter two, for he had them with him always.

With the rope the cowboy at times captured the coyote. And under special circumstances he had taken deer and even antelope in this way. Elk had been roped by cowboys very many times. It is known that even the mountain sheep has been so taken, almost incredible as it may seem. The buffalo was frequently the object of the cowpuncher's ambitions. Though sometimes such a vaulting ambition overleaped itself. An old cowboy who once roped a full grown buffalo bull described his emotions as decidedly far from pleasant when he found himself attached to such an animal: "I thought I could shore throw any bull there was," he said, "but that there thing plumb run off with me an' the bronc both, an' the only thing I was thinkin' of was to turn it loose."

The young buffalo, especially the calves, were often roped and made captive by the cowboys. Many instances were known where these animals were found in the round-ups of the early days. And in such cases some of them were caught by the cowboys who often took them home and kept them. The beginnings of all the herds of buffalo now in captivity in this country were in the calves roped and secured by cowboys.

It required an expert man to rope and capture a buffalo, or even a young calf, for the little fellows were incredibly swift and asked the limit of a horse's speed and staying qualities. On a hunt for buffalo calves in the Panhandle of Texas much of the roping was done by a cowboy not yet twenty years of age. He was very skilful in his calling and an especially fine roper.

The buffalo for many years has been gone from the range. It will be rarely too, that the cowboy will ever again see out on the cow range the great grizzly bear. It once lived far east over the prairie country. But now has gone back into the mountains. Of course, the cowboys did not always rope him for it was rarely that the nature of the country made this possible. And sometimes they roped him and wished they could let him go. For a grizzly is uncommonly active and straightforward in his habits at close quarters.

One of the great pests of the cattle range were the wolves which annually inflicted a great loss upon the young stock. And against which an incessant war was waged by the whole range force. This more especially applied to the great gray wolf known as the timber wolf, buffalo wolf, "loper," "loafer," or "lobo" wolf. It was not possible, however, for the most energetic operations to clear the range of these pests. For they would drift in again from great distances.

The mountain lion is another animal in disrepute upon the cow range because of its fondness for young calves and colts. But the range and numbers of these animals was always so restricted that they cut less figure than the wolves in the annual estimate of losses in ranch work. The cowboy knew perfectly well that a more arrant coward never lived than this big hulking cat. For when it saw the cowboy on his horse-it just ran plumb away at full speed.

The cow range did not often or not long offer any great amount of fur bearing animals. The wolf, the coyote, the foxes and swifts, the antelope and deer, were the animals most frequently seen by the cowboy in his rounds. In some parts of the country, the cowboy carried a rifle in his scabbard. But the favorite weapon of the cowboy was really the sixshooter. Now it is a strange fact that the cowboy wasn't afraid of any big creature but only of some little ones!

The rattlesnake sometimes crawled into the cowboy's blankets at night. But this was a less dangerous affair as the snake was apt to be chilled and stupid. Yet another creature much dreaded on the range was the centipede which was also a night traveler. There was a superstition that if a centipede crawls across a man's flesh-the poison left by its hooked and penetrating feet will surely produce insanity.

The tarantula was still more poisonous than the centipede but seems less dreaded. Why? I really don't know the answer to that one. But those days bring the fact to mind. We were all deadly scared of the small plains polecat, Because the bite might produce hydrophobia. I know that One United States army regiment stationed at an Arizona post had some fatalities in this respect.

The cowboy was fond of any kind of a hazard, any manner of fight, any contest of skill, speed, or strength. Not much of a runner himself, he would back his favorite in a foot race. But wrestling and boxing were unknown in those days on the range. And it is well enough they were, as they might have led to a lessening of the visible supply of cowboys.

The horse race was an ever present and unfailing source of enjoyment for the cowboy. And if a rancher had a good quarter horse the whole outfit would back it against a horse from some other ranch or town. Sometimes the cowboys rode their own horses in such races. Or sometimes they trusted to riders of lighter weight.

The cowboy was above all things, a laboring man, with much to occupy his attention besides the demand for sports. The romance of the cowboy's life is best seen at a little distance from the cattle range. The visitor to the ranch has an enjoyable time. For his is the zest of novelty. The cowboy in turn cares for little what in turn delights the man from the States.

The cowboy longs to see a theatre, to have a trip to the city, to eat an oyster stew and all the green "garden truck" he can hold. To him it seems that all the great pleasures of life must lie beyond the range, in the settlements. The latter term usually meant for the cowboy, over the greater part of the cattle range, some squalid little cow town of the frontier. They say that the grass is always greener in the other fellow's pasture. Want an idea for a different kind of a western story? Take two men. One is an Easterner, the other a cowboy. The fellow from the East dreams of being a cowboy. The cowboy dreams of being an Easterner. Go have them change places. What would happen? I don't know, but you write the story and find out.

Let's get one thing straight and this concerns the "idealizing" of the life of the cowboy. Sure you got him his favorite horse. So he's humming a song and the sun is shining above. But let's get our weather facts straight. It could also pour and pour, as if all the water in the world just picked out the path on which the cowboy was travelling. Then he would have to wear that slicker. He might look like a half drowned sailor on a horse. Or change the season and fill the ground with a lot of snow. He had to keep from freezing. He might get lost and even get snow blinded.

It was tough work. It took a man to stand it. Those who couldn't take it just had to turn to some other way of life. The real dream of the cowboy was to eventually own his own spread. To have others work for him. He would still keep an eye on things, but manage to take it a bit easy.

The end of the round-up or the drive found the men of a cow outfit at some ragged, scattering little Western town. They had money to spend. So we better let them spend it and next time I'll tell you more concerning the cowboy as he really was in those days of the West."
